Propriety is the guiding principle for the ladies of Cranford society. No, Cranford is not London, but the ladies do keep abreast of what is currently proper in London society—as best they are able. And, though not true aristocrats, they are truly aristocratic—to the extent that they can afford to be. To be honest, the spinsters and widows who make up the majority of Cranford society are dependent on inherited interest income. String and paper must never be wasted; candles must be lighted only when company is at the door and extinguished when company leaves. Appearances must be maintained. And the appearances of men—especially the “followers”—must be avoided at all costs. This is the novel that has been adapted for presentation by the BBC three times, most recently in the 2007 and 2008 seasons. First published in 1851, it is a delightfully amusing, sometimes tragic, always warm glimpse into the innocence of a particular segment of mid-nineteenth century British society.
